I'm experiencing another post conference blues. I just came home from one of my favourite conferences. I started TESOL France from day 2. I met friends whom I had met before and missed a lot and I met friends who had been my online PLN for more than 2 years.

The first session I attended was “What’cha listening to?” and the speakers were Julia Aliverti and Jeffrey Doonan. Their talk was, just like me, using songs in the classroom. According to the speakers, music is the only language teenagers speak. I am not going to tell more about their session, hoping that they will continue to share the presentation in future conferences. It was a great talk and I enjoyed every minute of it.

They also mentioned about Disabled Access Friendly where teachers can find or donate lessons and raise awareness.

Imagine how life would be difficult or different for you if you were disabled. Some societies are very well aware of their disabled citizens and some are still learning. Some parents help their kids become Oscar Pistoriuses and some others are ashamed of them. Instead of feeling sorry for disabled kids, we can teach our able kids that they are not different from them.
